There may be more that you find, through the Bing suggested PDFs, however I don't find one for this title yet. We are doing the best we can to get this title out into the open. However, there are other ways to get pdfs, at least the ones I have found so far: Buy this ebook from major ebook vendors using the ISBN displayed on this page. Find out more at Alibris. The second option is to download this document to your computer using Chrome. Just use the QR code below. You can then either print it, scan it or email it to someone else. All should work. Hope this helps. Q: How does one obtain a basic example of the creation of a new element? I know this is a very general question, but I am curious as to how one goes about actually creating a new element in `JSON::Parser`. Basically, I want to have a function that takes a string, and returns a new `JSON::Parser::Object` which represents a simple node that is created for that string. For instance, the basic one should be something like this: `def create_node(string) #Create a new JSON::Parser::Object JSON::Parser::Object.new #Add the string as a value in the object JSON::Parser::Object.put(string, "String") #And return the object return JSON::Parser::Object end` I know that there is a method called `JSON::Parser::Parser#create_node` that can be used to generate a parser object with a simple node (which is represented by `JSON::Parser::Element`), and then call `#to_json` on that object to get the JSON representation of the node (or something like this). My question is how is the node actually created within the parser? Does a new class/object get instantiated? How does the variable "string" get passed in to this method? A: Your example will work, but it will work only until the end of the parser's lifetime. The mechanism is the actual `new_element(class_name,name,data,nil)` method, which is called to generate a new node.
